1846: Portrait of the Nation. On August 10, 1846, the act establishing the Smithsonian Institution was passed by Congress and immediately signed into law by President James K. Polk. In commemoration of the 150th anniversary of that event, this exhibition looks back at the America of 1846. The year began with the threat of war with England over the Oregon boundary; by year's end, war with Mexico raged, and the ominous debate over the spread of slavery in the vast territory expected to be ...

1846: Portrait of the Nation - National Portrait Gallery

For centuries, portraits have formed an important record of America's people. When you think of the nation's first president, the image that comes to mind is likely one created by portraitist Gilbert Stuart, George Washington (Vaughan portrait), 1795. Gilbert captures a broad-shouldered, ruddy-faced, and serious president who eyes us directly, full of character and probity.
