~~summary. High-profile rivalries between black male leaders in the early twentieth century have contributed to the view that integrationism and black nationalism were diametrically opposed philosophies shaped primarily by men. Bridging Race Divides challenges this conceptualization by examining prominent "race women" (including Amy Jacques Garvey, Mary McLeod Bethune, Madame C. J. Walker) as well as other participants in the Harlem Renaissance, Garveyism and the clubwomen's movement to reveal ...~~

~~Bridging Race Divides focuses on how prominent black women navigated the integrationist versus nationalist dichotomy. The author's central argument is that the political activism of prominent black women has been dismissed as assimilationist because their class status rendered them as inauthentic black folks--ones that could not connect with the struggles of their downtrodden brothers and sisters.~~
