Excerpts: Introduction - Dutch ships in Asian waters From the 16th century European ships sailed to Asian markets on a regular basis. Their main goal was the purchase of the highly sought after spices from the East Indies and exotica from China. Traditional trade and shipping relations between the west and east existed long before European ships arrived in the Indian Ocean region.

HNLMS Abraham Crijnssen is a Jan van Amstel-class minesweeper of the Royal Netherlands Navy. Built during the 1930s, she was based in the Netherlands East Indies when Japan attacked at the end of 1941. Ordered to retreat to Australia, the ship was disguised as a tropical island to avoid detection, and was the last Dutch ship to escape from the region. On arriving in Australia in 1942, she was commissioned into the Royal Australian Navy as HMAS Abraham Crijnssen and operated as an anti-submarine
